Impaired glucose tolerance and impaired fasting glucose as risk factors for glucose-related morbidity and mortality in the elderly: the Cardiovascular Health Study. To evaluate the utility of fasting glucose and 2-hour plasma glucose in predicting diabetes and cardiovascular disease (CVD) morbidity and mortality in elderly persons with impaired glucose tolerance (IGT) or impaired fasting glucose (IFG), we examined the baseline relationship of these traits to CVD morbidity and mortality over 6 years of follow-up in 1,496 men and women age 65-84 years in the Cardiovascular Health Study. Diabetes was diagnosed using the American Diabetes Association diagnostic criteria. After excluding those with known diabetes and excluding deaths in the first 12 months of observation (n = 7), there were 1,147 subjects left. Hypertension was present in 60.6% of subjects, and CVD was diagnosed in 40.2%. The baseline prevalence of IGT was 8.8% and IFG was 22.9%. During follow-up, 106 (9.6%) developed diabetes. Participants with IGT or IFG had a higher incidence of CVD events (10.9%), C 570a42141b
