A high-performance algorithm to calculate the electrostatic and van der Waals interactions in the CASSCF method. A high-performance algorithm is developed to calculate the electrostatic and van der Waals interactions (vdW) in the coupled-cluster singles and doubles method. The algorithm makes use of the fact that the vdW interaction can be divided into two elements: a charge-screened Coulomb term and a noncoulomb (full-exchange) term. By using the charge-screened Coulomb term, a reduction factor of 8 was found, which provides a significant speedup in the calculation of the vdW energy. For the Coulomb part, the non-overlapping method was used. A speedup factor of 5 was found. The reduced Coulomb integrals are transformed using a combination of random-phase approximations with the overlap principle. For the vdW part, which contains the full-exchange term, a new recoupling of the Kronecker delta matrix is introduced, by which the desired accuracy is obtained in a very short time without increasing memory requirements. This research develops an integrated theory of two related but different formulations of a long-standing problem in cognition: the problem of how intentionality, meaning, and knowledge can arise from the unconscious processing of sensorimotor information. This research focuses on understanding the way in which such processes interact with higher cognitive capacities such as classification and division of labor. This theory will be tested using behavioral methods and also modeling. The theory considers how the organization of associative networks, learning, and control of action by the brain may set up situations in which meaning, intentionality, and knowledge arise as a consequence of uncontrolled, automatic, and seemingly non-conscious processes. The theory is developed in specific relationship to two issues that have been studied extensively by human behaviorists: the role of feedback in controlling action, and the role of the prefrontal lobes in control. This approach provides a connection between a problem that has received attention from cognitive psychology, animal behavior, and artificial intelligence, and to experiments that have received attention in human cognition. ♦
