
comparison. It is known that the contrast level needed to produce a particular level of acuity varies with retinal location within the eye, i.e., around a fixation point. Since the contrast level required to determine acuity at a given point varies with location, different contrast levels must be used to test retinal acuity at different locations. When the same contrast level is used throughout the test, acuity is measured only at the same location. Because of this, acuity at a test location is never uniform, and generally it is lower than acuity at all other retinal locations. The uncertainty of the test occurs both between locations and between patients. For example, a patient with an acuity of 20/30 in the right eye and 20/20 in the left eye has a uniform acuity of 20/30 throughout. But, a patient with a 20/60 acuity in one eye and a 40/60 acuity in the other eye might achieve an acuity of 20/80 by testing all retinal locations, but might achieve 20/20 by testing only the most peripheral location. While various methods for measuring visual acuity for retinal location are known, they are usually inadequate for the purpose of determining if a patient is refractory to 3da54e8ca3
