Clinton's conciliatory tone after a 90-minute meeting with Abbas in the presence of Palestinian and Israeli negotiators did little to dull the acrimony in a conflict between Israel and the Palestinians that has entered its 25th year. U.S. officials said they were encouraged by Abbas' willingness to engage, despite his support for the U.N. Security Council's condemnation of Israel's building of Jewish settlements in disputed territories. The meeting did not produce a comprehensive proposal for the Palestinians and Israelis to negotiate their mutual differences, but two U.S. officials said they hope that some progress could be achieved this week at an international conference in Geneva. The officials said it was clear to Abbas that despite the frustration of his people, he agreed that the status quo was not sustainable. Abbas is likely to repeat the position he took in a speech in Ramallah this week that both the West Bank and Gaza could become independent states before Israel has fully withdrawn from the West Bank. Abbas said he was seeking a just and lasting peace that would include the "indivisible borders" of 1967 and 1967 lines. The Palestinians want to remain within their own pre-Six-Day War borders under the 1967 lines, and the Israelis have steadfastly rejected any such compromise. In his remarks, Abbas cited the Israeli settlements as the most difficult issue to resolve. He told Clinton the settlements would never be accepted as a base for a future Palestinian state. He said that "the Nakba is a historical fact." Clinton attempted to answer by citing the United
