Collectively, the cases shed light on the materiality and the dynamism of transformative spaces, and the importance of historical memory to such spaces, while also elucidating how social relations and identities are transformed in and through practice. Transformations are mediated in and through a multi-layered and dynamic system of socio-cultural relations that also comprise global-local relations as well as the power relations between them. Transformative spaces appear as sites for establishing new relations and new ways of ordering the relations. Through practice, transformative spaces change what can be discussed, understood and communicated. We therefore see transformative spaces as dynamic and capable of generating and generating new meaning and 'add value'. This explains why the case studies also emphasize the crucial value of the spaces and their effects at both the individual and the collective level. A main contribution of this special issue, therefore, is to provide insights into how transformative spaces are dynamic and capable of generating new knowledge, reconfiguring and forging new social relations and identity. This could also open up the opportunity to de-stabilize the rigidities of social relations and identities that are so crucial in neoliberal capitalist societies, wherein 'subjects' are increasingly identified as 'self-referential subjects', as we argue in Noosphere: Radical new space and social theory. Such a process is not about the transformation of some elements in social life but rather how social life itself is transformed, and how this transformation can be studied and theorized.
