

when you're designing in autocad, you're building a set of objects and associating them with one another. you work with the object you're drawing. you can make changes to the properties of the objects, such as line width, angle, color, thickness, etc. on a drawing. a property is a name or definition that's used in the program. a property can be specified through a text object. properties also can be set in the drawing canvas and linked to an object in the drawing. properties are given names and can be viewed and modified using a dialog box called property view. a pixel is a dot of color. each object can be described by a set of dots, in some sort of pattern. for example, the car's body has many different shapes and curves. one pixel can be used to represent the edges of one of these shapes or curves. of course, an object can have several pixels on it. line objects can be curved or straight; they can be continuous or discontinuous. when you draw lines, you select the line's endpoints. if the selected line is continuous, then there are no breaks. if it's discontinuous, you may create a break and join the two ends of the line. lines can span multiple objects. you can change the properties of an object by either selecting a line or using the object's properties or options menu. for example, you may select a line and make its color red. or you can select an object and choose properties. you may then see a dialog box for changing the line's color. you can change the properties of objects on a drawing: select an object, such as a line object, on a drawing. select the properties or options menu item. a dialog box appears. use the menus to select the properties you want to change and choose ok. the dialog box closes, and the properties on that object are changed.
