Still, if I were a Lightroom 5 target, I would give this version a few more weeks to settle in first. I still would like to have tried the previews of upcoming features in the Lightroom 5 beta. Pre-announcements are great, but there is a school of thought – especially with digital cameras – that suggests that previewing everything live may reduce the usefulness of a feature in the final version. I would have liked to tested both ways. However, I did notice that Adobe plans to release a separate Lightroom 5 Update Pack soon that will be available for download that will include almost all of the new Lightroom 5 features. Leaderboards are a great way to showcase images. However, you need to have very specific images to make a good leaderboard. You can apply labels to each image you need to showcase, but often labels don't make for good leaderboard items. I didn't find this change very useful myself, but for those readers who are more in-tune with this than I am, it has advantages. In the previous version, no matter where you added a Slice widget, it would appear in all folders as long as they contained images. The new version lets you set it up so that each folder can have its own widget (with its own configuration options for the Slice widget). You can personalize the widgets and control what is visible or not in each folder. You don't have to repeat the process, either. Once you've defined widgets for your folders, they will appear in each folder, as long as they contain images. This allows you to add widgets to any folder, then quickly re-arrange them for a specific viewing scheme. For example, my News folder contains no specific widgets, so I can move them to the Photos folder without worrying about what would happen to any images not in the News folder.

Today, Photoshop has been living in the browser. More importantly, it's living in the browser as a single app experience. The fact that the browser can render the entire application and act like a native application is almost surreal and a source of great pride. I feel like a new-age computer graphics or multimedia specialist from the 2006–2007 era, that could do wonders on a workstation but could barely perform basic tasks in the browser even a decade ago. If you've used Photoshop on any desktop or mobile device, I'm sure you've experienced it — you just can't help but be amazed by how powerful a node can be when it runs directly on the device. I remember using in early 2017 when the announcement of the access of Photoshop on the web was made. I was thinking of several tiers of creativity — design, photography and video — and the web was left out of this. Yet, it was firmly a reality now. The folks at Adobe must have had the same thought process. We have photography on the web and I am sure the same thought process was repeated for others in the art world. I started getting some actual use cases of using the web in the real world. This was a notable moment in my life! I was a Photoshop user on a macOS or Windows desktop and working on a Macintosh desktop. It was now my turn to work on a Mac desktop on the web and it was great. Tools from my toolbox were now available to me and the way I use it were in an entirely different way. 2,580 euros. This makes the offer completely irresistible. It is still not any less than the price of a brand new car or a brand new outright computer. If you make a mistake, you can always go back and remove the purchase in the settings menu. Even if you buy some tool today you'll only be able to use it for a few months and after that free updates will be discontinued. So, I would suggest buying it as a useful leverage when you are on a tight budget and you have some space, and you're in no rush to buy something else.

The name of the Adobe Photoshop camera app is bit tricky to explain in a few words. I will try to explain the most important parts of it. Photoshop + camera app – allows you to get the Photoshop experience in your smartphone, without the need to download the entire package. The app is able to take fantastic photos, and make graphics and computer images in a fraction of the time of a regular graphic design tool.
